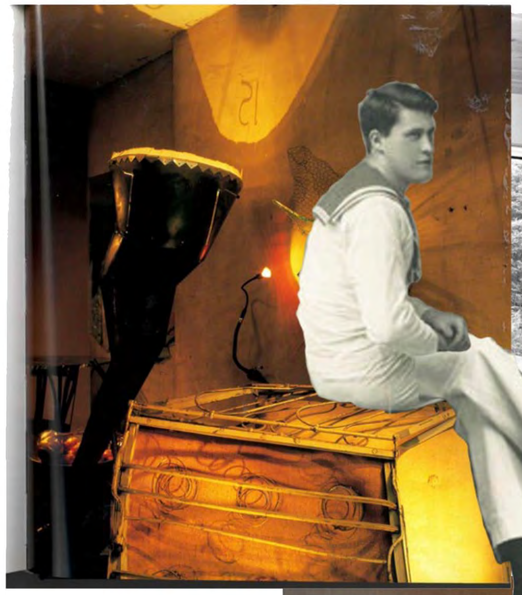
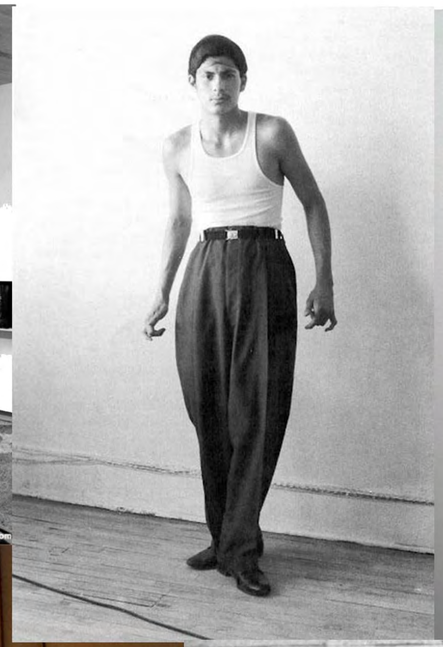
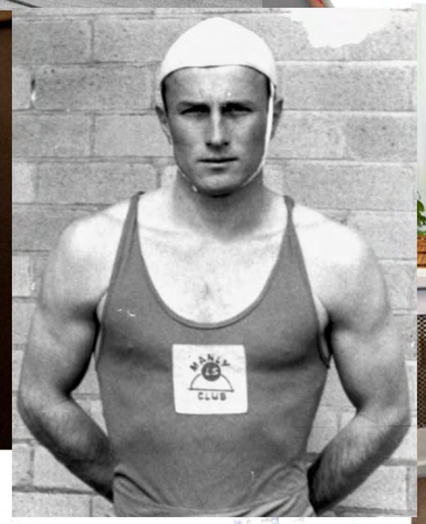
SITTING WITH MASCULINITY

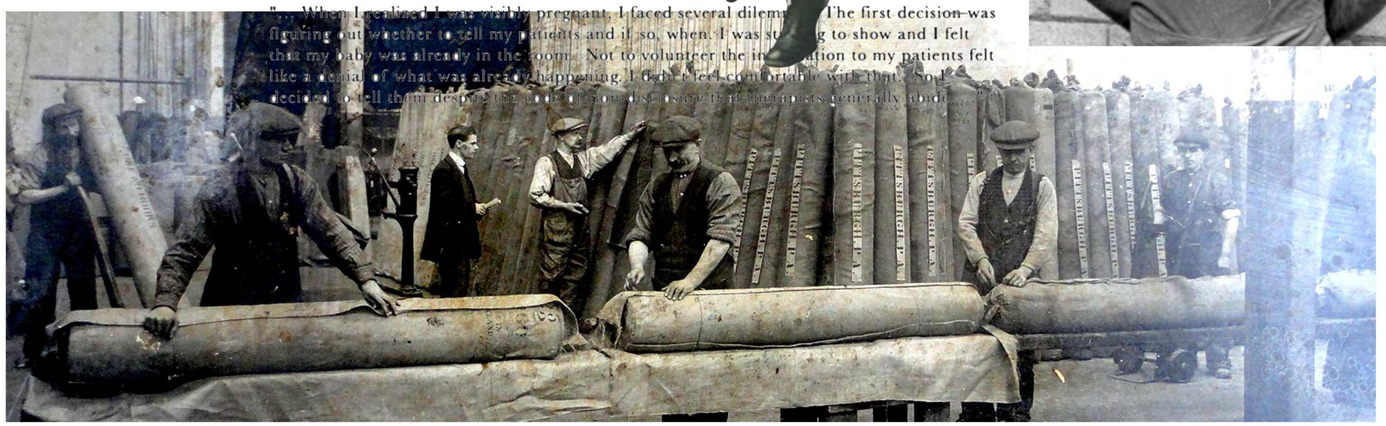
MAYA HARBER







"... When I realized I was visibly pregnant, I faced several dilemmas. The first decision was figuring out whether to tell my patients and if so, when. I was starting to show and I felt that my baby was already in the room. Not to volunteer the information to my patients felt like a denial of what was already happening. I didn't feel comfortable with that. So I decided to tell them despite the code of conduct suggesting that therapists generally abide ..."



"... Upon returning to New York from a visit to the Jung Institute of Zurich, I had a series of dreams of a woman entwined with serpents that I interpreted as a portent of my need for self-transformation. This corresponds with Jung's own interpretation of snakes as the harbingers of change. In one of my dreams, a voice commanded me to sculpt these images. I had never before made anything in clay but I listened to my unconscious and have continued to create art to this day. I keep several examples in my office of both my sculptures and paintings. ..."
